Dedication

To Rashi, for picking up the broken pieces of my heart and making me whole again. This book is as much yours as it is mine.

To my family, for always being home.

And to the part of me that never gave up—this book exists because of you.

Acknowledgement

To my mom and dad—thank you for always being my biggest supporters, and for the cups of tea late at night that kept me going.

A huge thank you to Rashi, for always picking me up when I felt lost, for encouraging me to write, and for being there every step of the way with your thoughtful feedback.

To my wonderful friends—Devanshi, Nandini, Sonam, Saloni, Fariha, Mahendra, Fatma, and everyone who's been part of this journey. If I missed anyone, please know you've been in my heart through it all.

Thank you to my consultant, Mayank, and the entire BlueRose Publication team, for guiding me with so much patience and love, and for making this possible.

To the one who holds my heart—thank you for being my calm, for making me smile. I'll always remember your priceless reaction when I told you about this book—it made everything feel worth it.

Finally, to you, my beloved reader—thank you for holding this book in your hands. Without you, none of this would mean anything.

Foreword

Heartbreak is quiet. It doesn't always show, but it's there—in the things left unsaid, in the spaces they once filled, in the silence that lingers.

In the Silence You Left Behind is a gentle reminder that healing is not about forgetting, but about learning to live with what was left behind. Sumitra Manda's words hold a kind of warmth that makes you feel understood, even in your loneliest moments.

This book is here for you, to sit with you in the quiet, to remind you that even the softest hearts find their way back to themselves. Take your time. Healing will come.

Preface

This book is for the quiet hearts—the ones that break softly, love deeply, and heal slowly. In the Silence You Left Behind is a collection of thoughts and feelings we often keep to ourselves. It's about the moments when everything feels too heavy, the memories that refuse to fade, and the quiet hope that healing will come, little by little.

I've poured my heart into these pages, hoping you'll find comfort in them. Healing takes time, and it's okay if it doesn't happen all at once. You are not alone in this.

Dear Old Me,

I wish I could tell you it's going to be okay. I wish I could make all the heartbreaks disappear, all the nights when you cried yourself to sleep. But if I did that, you wouldn't be here today—stronger, wiser, and so much more whole. You made it through because of everything you endured, not despite it. Keep going, because I'm here now, and we're going to be okay.

Dear Heart,

I'm sorry for every time I let you shatter,
For every piece of you I carelessly allowed to fall.
I should have protected you better,
Nurtured you when the world was too harsh.
But now, I promise, I'll be here.
I'll gather the broken fragments,
And, piece by piece,
I'll heal you,
Until you're whole again.
You deserve so much more than the pain you've known.
And I swear, I'll never let you fall apart like that again.

Does it ever happen to you? You love someone so deeply, you let them see every part of you—your brightest laughter, your quiet fears, the words you never shared with anyone else. You become an open book, believing the bond is too pure to break. And yet, one day, they leave. Without a goodbye. Without closure.

And that's when everything starts to shake. You replay every moment, wondering if it ever meant anything. You start questioning—don't you deserve closure from the person who knew you so well? Someone who held your heart so close and still walked away?

Life moves forward, as it always does. Something good happens, and for a second, you wish you could tell them. You wonder if they ever think of you, if they ever look back. And a part of you hopes—maybe, just maybe—when they see you again, when they realize how much you suffered in their absence, they'll finally understand what they lost.

I know how heavy that feeling is. That's why I wrote this book—to hold all those emotions, all those unanswered questions, and turn them into warmth. Some pages carry truths you might not want to face, but might need on your worst days. (Though I hope life is always kind to you.)

So, if you ever find yourself searching for understanding, for comfort, for something that feels like a hug on a cold day—maybe you'll find it here.

You may cry as you read this book, and that's okay. Don't hold back your tears, let them flow, because I believe with all my heart that each tear will water the garden, you're building within yourself.

This book is full of pain, but it's also full of healing. It's a journey through hurt and heartache, but I promise you, you'll pick yourself up from every tough moment. I know you will.

So, cry if you need to. Just remember, after every storm, the sun always finds its way through.

With love,

— Your New Friend

Dear Reader,

If this book feels like it's written for you, it's because it is.

For the days you begged them to stay but they walked away anyway.

For the nights you cried into the emptiness they left behind.

For the moments you thought you'd never breathe without pain again.

For the times you rebuild yourself, only to shatter once more.

For the days you questioned why it always had to be you.

This book is for every crack, every scar, and every piece of you still holding on.

I know you're scared,

Scared of the songs they loved,
Of the places you once called "ours,"
Of the silence that now echoes where laughter used to live.
I know you flinch when someone says their name,
And your heart sinks when the phone rings,
Because for a second, you hope it's them,
Even though you know it's not.
You're scared of people asking,
"What happened to the two of you?"
Scared of meeting their friends, their family,
Scared of meeting yourself in the mirror.
I know you're scared of walking into the world without them,
Of being the one who's "left behind."
But let me tell you this:
Even fear is not stronger than you.
If you're here, reading this,
It means you're still standing,

Still breathing,

Still trying.

And that, my love, is courage in its purest form.

Not all storms are meant to destroy;
some clear the way.

You said,

“I hope your heart never breaks.”

Then you broke it—

Quietly, completely.

Now, every shattered piece whispers your name,

Every corner of my soul aches for what you left,

For the silence that followed

When you walked away.

I carry the weight of you,

Even though you let me go.

You were the sun, but I was the shadow, always waiting to disappear.

It's strange,
how one can leave so easily,
like closing a door,
like a step forward means forgetting.

And yet,
another is left behind,
frozen in place,
unable to understand
how something so whole
could fall apart
without a sound.

You were so busy breaking my heart,
While I was drowning in your pain,
Hoping to pull you out of the dark,
But instead, I got lost in your storm.
I gave you all of me—
Every crack, every flaw,
Thinking if I could fix you,
Maybe I could fix what we were.
But you shattered me,
And never once saw how hard I was falling apart,
Trying to hold you together.

The cruelest heartbreak comes not from those who leave, but from those who stayed just long enough to teach you how to need them.

If you have someone who reassures you without you even asking, who doesn't make you feel like your overthinking is a burden—please, keep them. Hold their heart with care, because people like that are rare, almost irreplaceable. If you lose them now, you may never find someone who loves you in the same quiet, patient way.

— Treasure them, always.

You left me with a thousand questions,
Each one heavier than the last.
I search for answers in every corner,
In every memory, in every quiet night,
Only to realize that the truth is still with you.
But you chose silence.
And now I'm here,
Lost and aching,
Wondering if I ever mattered enough
For you to speak.

You keep asking why they left,

But the real question is—

Why did you stay in a place

That made you feel so small?

The rain fell,
not because it wanted to,
but because it had to.
Like me.

I used to wonder how someone could feel empty,

After just one person walked away.

But then you left,

And I realized, that's exactly how it feels.

It's not the goodbye that hurts the most; it's the realization that you weren't enough to make them stay. You gave everything, yet it wasn't enough to fill the empty spaces in their heart. It's like trying to fill a cup with water, but the cup has a hole in the bottom. You pour everything in, and yet, they're still empty.

I bought the same shirt you wore in my favorite picture of yours,
Just to feel your presence,
To hold on to something that was once real.
But now, every time I wear it,
All I get is the emptiness of your absence,
Wrapped in fabric that will never hold you.

People keep asking me, “What happened between you two, so suddenly?”

And all I can do is stay silent,

Pretend I don’t feel the weight of their words.

They ask me about the last call we had,

But how do I tell them

That you didn’t even agree to it?

How do I explain that, in that final moment,

You didn’t fight for us,

You didn’t even try to save what we had?

How do I tell them

That I’m still holding onto a love

That you let slip away without a second thought?

How do I tell them

That it was you who let go,

Not me?

Losing someone you love breaks you, but the real pain is in hearing their name on someone else's lips, knowing you have no answers, only the silence of what used to be.

After they chose someone else, you're left wondering if you were never enough. But what's ugly isn't you—it's how they walked away without seeing the treasure they had. You're like the ocean, calm on the surface, but with so much depth hidden beneath that is stronger than they'll ever know.

— I believe in you

I was searching for that one reason to stay,

when you gave me a thousand reasons to leave.

What hurts the most is how easy it was for you to let go,

and now I'm left questioning if I ever truly mattered to you.

It cuts deeper knowing that all those words you spoke,

were nothing but lies.

They'll create situations that push you to the edge, making it impossible to stay and when you finally walk away, they don't even try to stop you. That's the kind of closure they gave you—the kind where they waited for you to leave first, so they wouldn't have to carry the weight of being the one who gave up.

I look at your pictures,

And my heart whispers, he can't be a liar.

All I see is that innocent, lovable boy

I fell for,

And for a moment, I forget the pain,

Believing in the love that now feels so distant.

Sometimes, the ones who appear strongest are the ones quietly falling apart when no one's looking.

— I hope you heal soon.

Did you really sleep peacefully that night,
While I stayed up, drowning in my own tears?
I begged for just a minute,
But you turned your back and walked away.
Didn't it cross your mind,
Before you let go of us,
How much were you leaving behind?
Leaving me shattered,
With nothing but hopelessness to hold?

Don't spend your nights crying,
for those who rest so easily,
unbothered by the ache they left.

Your tears deserve someone who would wipe them away,
not someone who caused them.

Rest your heart, my dear,
and let the pain pass.

Peace will find you too,
in the arms of someone true.

Was it worth losing me,

Or were we nothing at all?

Was the bond nothing?

Then why did you call me your favourite person?

Do people leave their favourite person stranded in the ocean,

When that person was there,

Just to help them reach the shore safely?

You know that feeling when you miss the last train? You can stand at the station all night, but the train's gone. It's time to find your own way home and keep going.

I thought I knew every corner of your heart,
But I never asked about the parts I couldn't reach.
I never wondered what could've kept you from slipping away.
And now, I'm left searching for the pieces of us,
Wondering where I went wrong.

Sometimes, the hardest part isn't losing someone, but realizing they were never as close as you thought.

I told you my greatest fear was losing you,

And you swore you'd never walk away.

But your absence has become my reality,

A truth I never wanted to face.

Did you lie to me,

Or did you just never understand the weight of those words?

I remember once trying to catch a butterfly in a garden. The more I chased it, the more it flew away, just out of reach. But when I stopped running, stood still, and allowed it to come closer on its own, it landed gently in my hand. Sometimes, we chase after people or things so desperately, afraid of losing them, that we only push them further away. It's when we stop clinging so tightly that they can come back naturally, if they're meant to.

I believed you when you said you'd stay,

But your silence broke me more than any goodbye,

Now I'm left with memories,

And the question of why.

You don't always realize how much someone has changed you until they're gone. And when they leave, you're left with pieces of yourself scattered around the place they used to be. It's like trying to put together a puzzle, but the pieces don't fit anymore.

To the One Who Feels,

Sometimes the questions that they never answer are the ones that hold the most weight, but don't carry that burden. You loved deeply, and that's the beauty of it.

I never liked momos—

The taste, the texture, everything about them.

But because you loved them,

I find myself sitting at that corner stall now,

Plates steaming in front of me,

Hoping that maybe, just maybe,

One bite will bring you back.

Does it?

Do you hear me, somewhere in the spice,

In the memories that never leave?

I don't hate you.

But I hate the silence you left behind,

The way it crawls into my chest

And steals the air I breathe.

I hate how your laughter

Still echoes in the walls of my mind,

Filling the empty spaces

You once called home.

I hate the way your absence lingers,

Like a shadow in the sunlight—

Always there,

But never whole.

I never believed in God.

I didn't need to—

Not when I had you.

You believed enough for both of us,

And I believed in you.

But now I sit here,

Hands clasped in the quiet,

Hoping for answers

From a God I never believed in—

Until He took you away.

Hopes in my heart,

Prayers on my lips,

Temples in my mind.

I've changed so much for a shadow,

But does that shadow remember me?

There's a quiet sadness in changing yourself just to be loved. We bend ourselves so much for others, believing it will bring us closer, but in the end, we lose pieces of who we are. The truth is, the right love will never ask you to change, but to be seen for exactly who you are. Only then will you truly feel loved.

I know the weight you're carrying right now feels like it will never lift, but trust me, one day, you'll look back and thank yourself for being so strong. This pain, as deep as it feels, is the very thing that will help you rise higher than you ever imagined. I promise, you'll be grateful for the journey that brought you here.

— Strength

I don't wish you pain,

But one day, I hope you feel the sting,

Of loving so deeply,

Only to be left behind.

Your voice felt like home,
A soft place where my soul could rest.
I still hear it in the quiet,
The way you said my name
Like it was the only thing that mattered.
Now, the silence is deafening.
It wraps around me, heavy and cold,
Filling the spaces where you used to be.
Your warmth is gone,
And all I'm left with
Is an emptiness
That no sound can ever reach.

My Beloved Reader,

I don't know your story,

But I know your strength.

You've survived every dark day,

Every sleepless night.

And if that's not proof of your power,

What is?

We once dreamed beneath the same stars,

Shared secrets that only we could hear.

Now, the night is quiet,

And I wonder if you still see the sky the way we did.

Your lips touched my forehead,
As if I was something to cherish.
I still feel the warmth,
But now it stings,
Because the hands that held me
Are the same hands that let me go.

People who give you all their time at the start,
are the same ones who get busy
once you've given them all of yours.
They make you feel like you matter,
but when you're all in,
they pull you away,
and you're left wondering
if you were ever worth the time they gave.

They say losing love hurts,
Losing a best friend hurts,
Losing the one who was your home hurts,
But what about those who lose everything,
When that one person walks away?
Not just love,
Not just a friend,
But all the pieces that made you whole.

To you, the quiet warrior,

The second rain doesn't make the soil fragrant,

No matter how much you wish it would.

Giving them another chance won't heal what's broken,

But remember—next year, it will rain again.

And when it does, the earth will bloom,

just like your heart will, in its own time.

You told me I was your favorite person,
And for a while, I believed it too.
But now, I stand in the space between what was,
And what is no longer here.
I still feel your presence in the quiet moments,
In the spaces you once filled with laughter.
I wonder if you still think of me,
Or if I've already faded from your heart,
Like all the things we promised but never kept.

Sometimes, the people we trust with our deepest secrets and the softest parts of our soul are the ones who end up breaking us. It's not the betrayal of strangers that wounds the most, but the silence and distance of someone who once called you everything. When someone who once loved you turns away, it feels like the world has been turned upside down. But remember, just because they couldn't see the value of your love, doesn't mean you aren't worthy of it.

You are worthy of a love that stays, one that cherishes you as much as you've always given to others. It's okay to feel lost for a while, but don't let this loss define who you are. What you've gone through doesn't lessen your worth—it strengthens it. You've loved deeply, and that means you know how to love again. This time, you'll love with more strength, more grace, and more wisdom. You deserve all the love this world has to offer, and in time, you'll find it again. I promise.

You didn't just leave me;

You took the version of me

That believed in love.

The girl who smiled without a reason,

Who laughed too loud at bad jokes—

She doesn't exist anymore.

You left,

And I've been trying to find her

Ever since.

The pain isn't just in losing them—it's in realizing you can never go back to who you were before you loved them.

And sometimes,
I just want to cry—
Cry without a reason,
Without an end.
Because I'm tired of carrying the weight of memories,
Of fighting battles no one sees,
Of waking up each day
Only to feel this endless ache.
Tired of everyone asking if I'm okay,
When the truth is,
I've forgotten what "okay" feels like.
I cry, not because I want to,
But because it's the only thing
That reminds me I'm still here—
Even if, deep down, I no longer want to be.

I visited the ocean once, just after a storm. The waves were wild, unruly, like they were still trying to find themselves. But the next morning, the water was calm again, reflecting the sunrise as if to say, “I’ve made it through, and so will you.”

The day you stopped saying “Good morning, cutie,”

My mornings never felt the same.

The sun no longer felt warm,

And mornings became a place I feared to face.

If nobody told you this, let me tell you this today:

You are allowed to let go of what hurts, even if it was once something you loved. It's okay to choose peace over memories that weigh you down.

Do you ever wonder where I am?

When you sit in the quiet

Do you feel the emptiness where my voice used to be?

Because I do.

I hear your silence in the spaces between my breaths,

And wonder if you ever hear mine,

The one that echoes back at me,

A constant reminder of what I've lost.

I try to fill the gaps with words,

But nothing feels right anymore—

Not without you.

Not without the fragments of me you shattered.

You think telling them how much you miss them, how deeply you're hurt, will make them see what they did? It won't, my love. They watched you fall—and still chose not to hold your hand.

The open sky used to make me dream.

Now, it feels too wide,

Too empty.

I look up,

And all I see is the version of us

We were supposed to become.

I close my eyes,

But even there, you're gone.

We sat by the ocean,
Watched the sun fall into the water,
Talked about nothing
Until that nothing became everything.
But now, the ocean feels like grief,
And I'm too afraid
To watch the sun, disappear again.

People who turn sunsets into promises often forget how dark the nights can be.

Beaches used to be where we found ourselves,
Where the world felt small, and time stood still.
Now, they're just distant memories,
Places I'll never walk again.
Because no matter how many waves crash,
You'll never be there to meet me.
I'll never feel your hand in mine,
The way it once fit so perfectly.
No matter how long I sit there,
The space beside me will always be empty.

The waves won't stop crashing, but with time, you'll learn that some spaces are meant for healing, not for someone else to fill.

I hear you're doing fine.

I see you laughing with others,

The ones who never kissed your tears away,

The ones who never saw the vulnerability behind your smile.

Do they walk beside you now,

Or hold your hand the way I once did?

Do they understand the quiet places inside you,

Or is it all just noise to them?

Sometimes, you convince yourself that they need you, that no one else can understand them like you did, that you're the one who can make everything better. You think maybe you should be there for them, to hold the pieces together when they fall apart. But, my love, the reality is that sometimes the love we offer isn't enough to heal their wounds, no matter how hard we try. The truth is, some battles are theirs to fight, and some paths they need to walk alone.

It's heartbreaking, I know. But loving them doesn't always mean fixing everything. It means knowing when to let go, when to trust that they'll find their way, just as you'll find yours. You've done enough. Now, it's time to turn that love inward. Because you deserve that same tenderness, that same care, that same healing.

— Keep healing

They say heartbreak doesn't kill you,
But I'm not living either.
I'm just a ghost,
Moving through the days
Like the wind through empty branches—
There, but never really felt.
The sun rises,
But it doesn't warm me anymore.
It's just light,
Falling on a life that feels hollow.
They don't see it—
The way my chest aches at every memory,
The way your absence weighs heavier than the air I breathe.
Maybe you don't die from heartbreak,
But I'm not sure what you call this—
This quiet unraveling of a soul
That no longer knows how to belong.

Someone once told me, 'You don't drown by falling in the water; you drown by staying there,' and I felt that.

To the one who's been left shattered,

The waves kiss the shore,

Only to retreat again.

But they never stop returning—

It's in their nature to try.

Be like the waves—

Keep coming back to yourself,

No matter how many times life pulls you away.

I wish I could forget you,
Like the rain forgets the ground it leaves behind,
Like the sky moves on from storms
Without a second thought.
But you linger in the quiet,
In the spaces where light doesn't reach.
I count the days,
Hoping to unlearn the way
Your name feels on my tongue.
Maybe one day,
The stars will look less like you,
And the moon will shine for me instead.

You thought the fire could devour us,
Reduce the story to nothing but dust.
But some truths are too strong
To be swallowed by flames.
I won't scream them to the world.
This love, this pain—it's mine.
The beauty you forgot,
The hurt you left behind,
I'll keep it whole,
Not as a wound,
But as a part of who I am,
Where it can't be touched,
Not even by you.

I know how it feels when someone who once held you so close suddenly acts like you never mattered. When they erase every trace of you from their life, severing connections like you were just a passing shadow. It's cruel, isn't it? To be treated like a disposable piece of their past, as if your presence was never real, as if you were nothing more than a burden they couldn't wait to shed.

But my love, hear me. Their actions speak not of your worth but of their own insecurities. It's not you they are running from—it's the reflection of themselves they can't bear to face. They are afraid the world might see the truth of who they are. So, they push you away, not because you are unworthy, but because they are too fragile to confront their own cruelty.

You are not a trash bag. You are a mosaic of love and strength, even when they try to make you feel like fragments.

Did you wait for me to shatter,
So you could walk away without guilt?
I held onto you,
Thinking love was enough.
But now I wonder,
Was I just too much for you,
Or not enough to make you stay?

To the one holding this book,
I know your heart feels heavy.
But do you see the sun outside?
It rises every day,
Just like you do.

Even when the night is long,
You find a way to wake up.
That's not weakness—that's strength.

You left without a word,
And I spent days chasing the silence,
Wondering why you didn't just say it—
That you were done.
I would've let you go,
But instead, you vanished,
Leaving me here,
Still waiting for the goodbye
You never gave me.

Silence doesn't break you; waiting for words that never come does.

In English, we say, “She is broken.”

But in poetry, we say,

“She’s a glass once held with care,

Shattered by the hands she trusted most.

Now, every piece she picks up

Cuts her fingers,

Yet she keeps rebuilding,

Even if it hurts to hold herself.”

Lygmós / Greek

(n.) hearts that break in quiet

You were the only one who saw my tears,
The only one who felt my pain without judgment.
Now, who can I cry to?
When the one who made me feel safe enough to break
Is the one who walked away,
Leaving me with no place to go—
No arms to catch me when the storm hits again.

The ones who knew all your secrets often end up becoming a secret you can never speak of.

My keyboard still remembers you.

Every time my fingers brush the keys,
It types your name, without me asking,
Like it's still waiting for you to call back.
But it doesn't know,
How cruel it is,
To keep your name alive when you've already
Let go of every part of me.

I hate the month that brings my birthday,
The month you chose to leave,
After making me wait with excitement,
Counting down the days,
Only for it to turn into a reminder of what's lost.
The words "Happy Birthday" feel empty now,
When the only voice I long for is yours.

On days like this, when something feels missing, and the world doesn't shine as bright, it's okay to feel that emptiness. When someone you once shared everything with isn't around, it leaves a space that's hard to ignore. You might find yourself looking around, wondering where the spark went.

— Be kind to yourself

I was the book you left gathering dust,

While you were the verse I replayed endlessly.

Sometimes, the hardest thing to accept is that you were a chapter in someone else's story, while they were the entire book in yours.

Sometimes I miss you so much,
That the silence feels loud,
And your absence cuts deeper than words can say.
I find myself scrolling through old messages,
Reading every word you ever wrote,
Holding on to the sound of your voice in my mind,
Trying to feel your touch, your warmth,
The way you whispered like I was the only one.
I can't stop my tears,
They fall like rain,
Washing over the pieces of my heart
You once held so gently.
I ache to hug you again,
To feel your arms around me,
To let the pain pour out like a child crying for comfort,
A child you promised to keep safe.

I loved you with my eyes closed,
Trusted you more than my own breath.
When you left,
You didn't just walk away—
you called me blind,
For seeing something in you
That wasn't ever there.

I considered you my home,

And when you left,

I've been lost,

Roaming homeless,

Ever since.

People who say,

“You can come to me, always,”

Are the same ones who leave

When you have nowhere else to turn.

They build themselves as your home,

Only to burn it down,

And suddenly,

You have no place to go.

You search for a home in others, thinking their love will be the answer to the emptiness you feel. You reach out, hoping they'll fill the gaps you're too afraid to face alone. But what you forget is that home isn't something someone else can give you—it's something you've carried inside all along. It's in the quiet moments, the ones when no one's around, that you begin to understand.

The love you're looking for, the peace you crave, has always been within you. All it takes is the courage to see it.

You knew me.

And that's what hurts the most.

Because you knew exactly what it would take to break me,

And you did it anyway.

When the ones who understand your pain the most are the ones who cause it, the silence feels unbearable.

I saw people change,

But no one changed the way you did.

You turned into someone unrecognizable,

And left me holding onto the version I once knew,

While you faded away into someone I no longer knew.

I still feel the weight of the guilt,

like I gave away parts of me

that should have been kept safe.

I loved you with everything I had,

but somewhere, along the way,

I stopped loving myself enough to know when to walk away.

I hope you never feel the heartbreak I did,
The weight of loving someone who walks away so easily.
That you question your worth because someone couldn't see it.
I hope no one leaves you staring at the ceiling,
Replaying every word, every touch,
Wondering where it all went wrong.
It's a pain I wouldn't wish on my worst enemy—
not even you, my love.

I don't hate you for leaving.

I hate how you made leaving look so easy,

How you turned love into a temporary thing,

And me into someone who still waits

For the impossible to return.

To the one who still loves,

I know your heart wants to reach out,
to give, to fix, to love like you always did.

But let me tell you this:

It's okay to keep that love for yourself.

You gave them everything—
your heart, your soul, your trust.

And now it's time to give those things back to you.

You can still love,
but don't lose yourself in the process.

You are the person who deserves the most love.

You are the person who deserves your heart,
the love you always gave to others.

Start there.

Love yourself first.

You might be wondering, “When will I finally move on?” The truth is, it’s not about a specific moment—it’s the little things that happen over time, the subtle shifts in how you see the world, how you see yourself. One day, you’ll realize you’ve been letting go without even noticing.

You'll move on the day you walk down that street again,

Alone, but this time, the tears won't fall.

When you hear that song, and it doesn't remind you of them,

But it just becomes another song you once loved.

You'll move on the day you smile for no reason,

When you realize that life is still full of surprises.

When their name no longer brings a sting,

But it feels like a whisper from the past, fading away.

You'll move on the day you sit at a café,

And that empty seat doesn't hurt anymore.

When you visit your "our place" and feel peace,

Knowing that some things are meant to be left behind.

You'll move on the day you stop searching for them,

When the silence feels like freedom, not loss.

And you'll realize, quietly, that you've been healing all along,

One step at a time, until it no longer feels like you're missing anything.

May I never fall for someone who makes me feel small,

Who only loves me when it's convenient,

And leaves me in silence when I need them most.

May I never give my heart to someone

Who doesn't see the value in the love I offer,

Someone who leaves without looking back,

Leaving me to pick up the pieces of a love

That was never truly theirs.

I may have shattered,
But broken glass still reflects light.
Piece by piece,
I will gather myself again,
Not for you,
But for me.

You don't grow stronger by avoiding the fire.

You grow stronger by standing tall, even when the flames surround you.

Running away from your memories won't heal the wound.

It's in facing them, letting the pain rise and fall,

That you'll find the peace you've been searching for.

The fire will eventually fade,

But only if you stand strong enough to let it burn itself out.

The place I gave you in my heart,
I won't give to anyone else,
I won't give it back to you either,
Because you walked away,
And that space feels empty now—
A reminder of promises
You never kept.

Even after all the love I carried for you,

I don't want you anymore.

I don't want your shadow following me,

Not because I've stopped loving,

But because I've seen who you really are,

And now, I choose to unsee it.

The love I once held is fading,

Not because it was never real,

But because it no longer has a place

In a life I'm learning to rebuild,

Without you.

It wasn't anger that made me stop loving you,

But the quiet realization

That love isn't enough

When you're the only one willing to give it.

I stopped loving you,

Not because I wanted to,

But because my heart needed peace,

And you had become a storm.

I'll never forget that night you left me,
When everything we had crumbled in an instant.
I said never,
As if saying it would stop the ache,
As if it could erase the hollow feeling in my chest.
But it didn't.
It only made the silence louder,
The emptiness deeper,
And every breath felt like a struggle,
Like I was gasping for air,
But you were already gone.
I remind myself of that pain every day,
Not because I can't forget,
But because I need to remember—
To never let anyone make me feel that way again.

And it ended—

or did it ever begin?

Your touch fades slowly,
like whispers in the wind.

I held on to shadows,
you let go of my hand.

Was I building a home
on nothing but sand?

In the silence you left behind,

I've learned to hear the echoes of my own strength.

Your absence once felt like a void,

But now, it's a space where my soul breathes freely.

Don't come back,

Because I've found the peace you couldn't offer.

You never knew how far I would go,
Fighting for you, even when you didn't show.
But in the end, I lost my way,
And I wish I'd left before that day.

I've held my heart too tight, for too long,
Not wanting to let go of the love I thought was mine.
But now, I stand in the quiet,
And realize that silence is a space to heal, not to break.
The weight of unspoken words lifts slowly,
Like a sun finally rising after endless nights.
I'll learn to love the stillness,
And let go of what was never meant to stay.
Until the questions fade,
And I find peace in the quiet I once feared.

Life will teach you how to lose,
How to let go of what you thought was yours.
And in that loss,
You'll find the courage to keep breathing,
Even when the air feels heavy.

You may feel guilty, I know. When you try to move on, that guilt will whisper questions: Was it love, or just attachment? And you'll sit there, lost in those thoughts, as if the answers could change what you feel. But love, think about how you still kiss their forehead in photographs, how your eyes fill with tears even now. That's not just attachment—that's love, deep and unshakable.

You're allowed to hold onto those moments and still take a step forward. Don't let guilt weigh you down. Moving on doesn't erase love; it just teaches you to carry it differently, in a way that feels a little less heavy.

You deserve the love that comes without hesitation,
A love that doesn't question, but simply stays,
Just like the love you give, deep and pure,
A love that never fades, always feels like home.

You deserve the love that your best friend shows,
Unspoken yet always present, steady and true,
The love that never demands, but always gives,
The kind that makes you feel seen, understood, and cared for.

You deserve the love your mother gave,
Unconditional, without limits or condition,
The love that saw you at your lowest,
And never turned away.

You deserve the love that never leaves,
The one that stands beside you through every storm,
A love that fights, that never gives up,
The love that heals, that makes you whole again.

Rise Above the Hurt,

Don't Pass It On

I hope you won't break another heart

Because someone broke yours.

Pain doesn't leave when you pass it on;

It stays, growing heavier.

The universe didn't hurt you to harden you;

It gave you a chance to rise,

To love yourself,

To become stronger.

Don't invite the same heartbreak

You've been through.

Be the love you wish you had,

But this time, love yourself first.

The cracks in your heart aren't flaws,

They're spaces for the light to enter.

Don't hide them, my love,

Let the world see how beautifully

You've survived the breaking.

You are not what they did to you,

You are every step you've taken since.

Every tear you've wiped away,

Every morning you chose to rise—

That is your power.

That is, YOU.

Some nights, the stars will remind you of them.

That's okay.

But remember, they are just stars,

And you are the sky

They could never fill.

One day, you'll laugh again

Without the ache in your chest.

You'll dance to a song you once avoided,

And wonder why you ever stopped.

That's the beauty of healing—it always comes.

I see you,

Reading this with a heart

That's been bruised but still beats.

Don't rush the healing, my love.

Even the earth takes time

To turn winter into spring.

You planted seeds in a desert,
Hoping they'd grow into forests.
It wasn't your fault the soil was dry.
But now, my love,
You've found rain in your own tears.
Water the garden within you.
Let the world wait.

There's this place between heartbreak and healing,
Where you feel like you're floating in a sea of confusion.
You can't feel the shore,
But you're not sinking either.
You're just there,
In the mess of it all.
And it's terrifying.
But what you don't know,
What you can't see,
Is that the water is slowly pulling you towards something better.
Something softer.
Something where you'll breathe again.
Even if you can't feel it yet.

If this book taught you one thing,

Let it be this:

Closure isn't something they give you.

It's the peace you find within yourself,

When you finally stop waiting

For the apology that may never come.

This book began as a way to process my pain, but it became something so much bigger. It became my way of connecting—to myself, to my story, and to the beauty of resilience. If you've made it to this page, I want to thank you for being a part of this journey.

I hope these words reminded you of your own strength. I hope they made you feel seen, even in your quietest moments. Remember, you are enough, even when you feel broken. You are enough, always.

This is not where love ends.

It's where it rests

Until I'm ready to feel it again.

Read This If You Feel Empty

There's a tree in the middle of a desert that grows without rain. They call it the Tree of Life, and no one knows how it survives. But it does. So even if you feel like you've been left in a wasteland, remember this: you, too, will find a way to grow again.

Read This If You Feel Unloved

A friend once said to me, “The ocean doesn’t stop being beautiful just because someone is afraid to swim.” Your love was vast and endless, like the sea. If they couldn’t see it, that doesn’t make it any less real.

Read This If You're Struggling to Let Go

A butterfly can't fly until it leaves the cocoon behind. It feels like an ending, but it's really a beginning. Letting go doesn't mean forgetting. It means giving yourself the freedom to breathe again.

Read This If You Feel Guilty Moving On

My love, moving on doesn't mean you're leaving them behind—it means you're carrying them differently. The memories, the love, the pieces of them you hold so tightly—they'll always be a part of you. But staying in the pain forever isn't what they'd want for you. You're not betraying them by choosing to live. You're honoring their place in your heart by giving yourself the chance to breathe again. Let go of the guilt, not the love. Because you matter, too.

Read This If You Feel Like Giving Up on Life

When life feels too heavy and the world seems so dark, it's easy to feel like giving up. I know. But hear me out—you're allowed to feel tired, to feel lost, to feel broken. That's part of being human. You don't have to see the end of the tunnel just yet. Just take one step. Even if it's small, even if it's slow. The darkness won't last forever. Hold on—there's still so much ahead of you, even if you can't see it right now.

— Don't lose hope

Read This If You Feel a Sudden Sadness Out of Nowhere

Sometimes, the sadness hits you like a wave, out of nowhere, and you're left wondering why. You might even think, "I'm moving on, so why do I feel this way?" It's okay to feel this. It doesn't mean you're stuck or failing. This sadness is part of the process—part of healing, part of remembering, part of letting go. It will pass. Feel it, but don't let it convince you that you're not moving forward. Healing isn't a straight line—it's a journey. And even on the hardest days, you're still on your way.

Read This If You Can't Stop Crying

I know how exhausting the tears can feel, how they can come without warning, flooding you like a storm you didn't see coming. But crying doesn't make you weak—it makes you human. Your heart is releasing what it couldn't carry anymore. Let the tears flow, and when they're done, you'll feel a little lighter, a little freer. It's okay to cry as many times as you need. It's not forever, and neither is the pain.

Read This If You Blame Yourself

The mind loves to replay mistakes, to overthink everything you did, wondering where you went wrong. But I need you to hear this: none of it was your fault. You loved, you gave, you tried. But love isn't always enough to make someone stay. Please don't carry the weight of their choices. You did everything you could. Don't blame yourself for something that wasn't yours to fix.

Someone told me that love is like planting a garden. You can water it, tend to it, and still, some flowers won't bloom. It's not because you failed—it's because not everything is meant to grow, no matter how much care you give.

Read This If You're Missing Them Tonight

The nights are the hardest, aren't they? When everything goes quiet, and their absence feels louder than ever. You can't help but wonder if they're missing you too. It's okay to miss them. It's okay to feel the weight of that emptiness. But remember—this feeling doesn't define you. You are still whole, even if it doesn't feel like it. It's okay to cry. It's okay to let it hurt. And then, when the tears stop, remember—you are enough, even without them.

~ Sending warm hugs

Read This If You're Questioning Your Worth

There's a story about a cracked vase that couldn't hold water. But when light poured through its cracks, it lit up the whole room. You're not broken. You're just showing the world where the light gets in.
